1. Introduction

This report accompanies the Election Survey Data on Citizen Meanings of Voting in 13 Countries (doi: 10.11587/1QQF9P) conducted by the University of Vienna within the context of the ERC Starting Grant project DeVOTE ("The meanings of 'voting' for ordinary citizens, their causes and consequences", see https://www.votemeanings.eu for further information about the project). The data collection focuses on the pre-election period in 13 countries – Australia, Brazil, Colombia, Estonia, Hungary, Italy, Kenya, Nigeria, Serbia, Sweden, Tunisia, Türkiye, and the USA – to study the meanings of voting for ordinary citizens, their causes, and consequences.

4. Study design

4.1 Sampling

Dynata surveyed in each country citizens with access to the internet and conducted online interviews. Respondents were sampled from pre-existing online panels. To participate in the study, respondents had to be citizens of their respective countries and of voting age. National quota sampling was employed based upon the following key demographics: age, gender, education and region. National target quotas were based upon the most recent national census data. Hence, the quotas were structured to closely represent the populations of each country in which the survey way fielded.

Opinium conducted both online and face-to-face interviews. In online surveys, Opinium surveyed citizens with access to the internet. Respondents were sampled from pre-existing online panels. To participate in the study, respondents had to be citizens of their respective countries and of voting age. National quota sampling was employed based upon the following key demographics: age, gender, education and region. National target quotas were based upon the most recent national census data. Hence, the quotas were structured to closely represent the populations of each country in which the survey way fielded.

In the face-to-face interviews, respondents were recruited geographically. To participate in the study, respondents had to be citizens of their respective countries and of voting age. National quota sampling was employed first targeting region, gender and age. Then, adjustments were made for education. National target quotas were based upon the most recent national census data. Hence, the quotas were structured to closely represent the populations of each country in which the survey way fielded.

Norstat surveyed in Estonia citizens with access to the internet and conducted online interviews. Respondents were sampled from pre-existing online panels. To participate in the study, respondents had to be citizens of their respective countries and of voting age. National quota sampling was employed based upon the following key demographics: age, gender, education and region. National target quotas were based upon the most recent national census data. Hence, the quotas were structured to closely represent the populations of each country in which the survey way fielded.

Below, we present a comparison of the target populations and our samples according to the core characteristics: age, gender, region, and education. Overall, the distribution achieved in the cross-sectional data collection closely mirrors that of the national population in these areas. However, there are some notable deviations. Specifically, in Serbia, we need to be flexible when it comes to individuals aged 65 and above. In Türkiye, Brazil, and Sweden, there is an underrepresentation of individuals with lower levels of education. Conversely, in Colombia, individuals with higher levels of attained education are overrepresented. Such variations in age and education are not uncommon in online survey research, as reaching older and less educated groups often presents challenges.[1]

4.3 Participation rate

Respondents were invited and incentivized to participate by Dynata using an incentive scale which is based on set time increments and panelist characteristics. All incentives are awarded only once the survey has been completed. The incentive options allow panelists to redeem from a large range of gift cards, points programs, charitable contributions, and partner products or services.

Opinium incentivized and paid respondents in 'reward points', which are later exchanged for vouchers. In terms of monetary value, a 20-minute online survey is usually equivalent to £0.07 in rewards.

Norstat incentivized and pays respondents in ‘Norstat coins’. For the completion of this online survey, respondents received 20 Norstat coins which are worth 2€.

Table 16 shows the gross sample sizes and response rates per country.

5. Data cleaning

5.1 Quality assurance and excluded respondents

We conducted quality checks immediately after conclusion of field work. We checked for speeding, straight-lining and completion of answers to the open-ended questions. After these quality checks we did not deem it necessary to exclude any respondents for quality control issues.

The exclusion criteria by this project, includes the exclusion of respondents with double IPs, underaged respondents, technical errors with IDs, and issues with interviewer quality in face-to-face interviews (see column "internal exclusion" in Table 16).

Open-ended answers including offensive language or swear words were removed in the data cleaning process. Inappropriate words were replaced with the placeholder "[removed]", while derogatory terms related to racial identity were replaced with the placeholder "[PoC]", referring to people of colour, where appropriate. Numbers potentially revealing the identity of respondents were replaced with "[99999]".

5.2 Variable format

Missing values are coded with a sign in front of the coding as follows:

-81 I only voted / will vote for the candidate in my constituency, not for a party (Italy)
-82 I do not know this party / I do not know this candidate
-83 I cast an invalid/blank ballot / would cast an invalid/blank ballot
-84 I have already voted
-85 I did not vote
-86 I did not have the right to vote
-87 independent candidate
-88 I was not registered to vote
-89 not applicable
-92 would abstain
-95 unknown
-96 other party / other candidate / other
-98 do not know
-99 refused / prefer not to say / I prefer not to answer
-997 invalid answer
-998 not asked due to routing
-999 not asked in country

6. Weighting of data

The dataset includes two weighting variables which can be used for post-stratification adjustment to known population distributions.

A "demographic" weight uses adjustment to known socio-demographic population distributions (age, gender, region, education): sweight

A combined "demographic" and "design" weight uses adjustment to known socio-demographic population distributions (age, gender, region, education) and corrects for the differing sample sizes across countries: weight

Note that respondents answering "don't know" or "refused" were categorised as missing and weighted neutrally.

For computing the weights 'ipfweight' in Stata was used. Computation of all weighting variables was limited to a minimum value of 0.25 and a maximum value of 4.00. Missing values in the target variables were weighted neutrally. In the iteration process, the maximum deviation allowed between the weighted margins and known population margins was 0.15%. Maximum iteration was 40.

Target distributions are based on official statistics and national census data.
